From 1901 through the 1960 season, the American League (as well as the National) was comprised of eight teams. When the A. L. decided to expand in 1960 with two new franchises for 1961, Washington was awarded one of those expansion outfits after the original Senators' owner, Clark Griffith, was given permission to move his team to Minneapolis/St. Paul to be re-branded the "Twins." Retired U. S. Air Force Lieutenant General Elwood "Pete" Quesada, a war hero and former FAA director under President Eisenhower, wanted to get into the sports business and found his place--for two years--as owner of the new Senators. (It was always believed Washington, D. C. should have a major league team. The original ballclub won three A. L. pennants and ONE World Series in 1924. They were mostly second division occupants and last in the standings many times; thus, the old refrain "First in war, first in peace, last in the American League.") The new Senators played their inaugural year in the decrepit, vacated Griffith Stadium and was put together via a player draft composed of ageing, second tier, unwanted major leaguers and minor leaguers. The Senators' first pick was lefty pitcher Bobby Shantz (Yankees) who never threw a pitch for his new employer. The only true bright spot was pitcher Dick Donovan (formerly of the White Sox) who had the best ERA in the league at year's end (2.40) and was an All Star...One-time Senators' slugger Mickey Vernon's team was last in league batting average (.244) and eighth in home runs (119). Catcher Gene Green (62 RBI) was the leader with 18 homers; Willie Tasby knocked home the most runs (63). Former Brave Danny O'Connell posted the most base hits (128) and runs scored (61). Dale Long and Tasby both slugged 17 jacks...The pitching staff's ERA was sixth-best (4.23). Bennie Daniels was the big winner (12) and logged the most strikeouts (110). Donovan won ten ballgames, completed eleven, and threw two shutouts...The Senators finished in a last place tie with Kansas City (47 ½ games out of first) and nine games behind their expansion cousins, the L. A. Angels. They beat the "old" Senators (now Twins), 9-8, in their season series...Washington lost its first game, at home, to the White Sox, 4-3. They committed four errors and led the game at one time, 2-0.
