Even with ninety-one wins, the Giants were the runners-up to the National League champion St. Louis Cardinals who won 101 games in '67. The Giants finished 10 ½ games behind the Cards with the Redbirds winning the season series, 11-7. Despite their all-around consistency the entire year, the Giants never spent a day holding the top spot in the N.L. Their longest winning streak was seven games, the longest losing skein six games. The largest deficit was 13 ½ games behind Saint Louis on August 25th. They were never more than six games under .500. San Francisco had the advantage in the season's match-ups with the Dodgers, 13-5...

Lefty Mike McCormick won 22 games, completed fourteen, and pitched five shutouts to be selected for the N.L.'s Cy Young Award. He struck out 150 batters for the season. Gaylord Perry was a 15-game winner and tied Juan Marichal for the lead on the pitching staff with 18 complete games. Perry topped the hurlers with 230 K's. Marichal claimed fourteen victories and struck out one hundred sixty-six opponents. Ray Sadecki rounded out the starting staff with twelve wins. The Giants led the N.L. with a 2.92 ERA and 64 complete games... "Stretch" McCovey blasted 31 home runs to lead the ball club and drove in ninety-one. Jim Ray Hart (29 homers) was tops with 99 runs batted in, 98 runs scored, and 167 base hits. Willie Mays tallied 22 dingers for the year with 70 RBI; he scored 83 times. The team ended the year batting .245 and finished third in the league with 140 home runs.
