The Summer of 1980 in baseball belonged to folk-hero Joe Charboneau. Originally a draft pick of the Twins (unsigned) the Phillies inked him to a contract and was playing in their minor league system before he was traded to the Indians for being termed a disgruntled employee and after having his nose rearranged in a barroom fight. He had hit .350 the season before the trade. In AA ball in '79, he hit a robust .352. More trouble came his way in March 1980 during a trip by the Indians for an exhibition game in Mexico when he was stabbed in the ribs with a pen by a deranged spectator. "Super Joe" rejoined the big club in early April and almost immediately became a fan fave. His prize-fighter looks, dyed hair, off-beat manner of personal dentistry, repair of a broken schnozz with a pair of pliers while anesthetized with a glass of whiskey, talent for drinking beer through his nose, and gritty play endeared him to Cleveland's blue-collar fans. He was named the 1980 A. L. Rookie of the Year off a season in which he led the team with 23 jacks and 87 RBI. There was even a song "Go Joe Charboneau" played by Cleveland radio stations. His career quickly went in decline after he injured his back in 1981 Spring Training resulting in surgery after the season. His '81 numbers: .210 BA, 4 homers, and 18 RBI. He disappeared from the professional scene in 1984 and was a movie extra in the great Robert Redford film The Natural...The Tribe ended the year fourth in the league with a .277 team BA. Their 89 home runs were fourteenth...Fireballer Len Barker, six foot five, was the pitching staff's leader with 19 wins and 187 strikeouts. Dan Spillner followed with 16 victories while Rick Waits won 13 and led the staff with nine complete games. A 4.68 ERA left the Indians hurlers 14th in the league.
