This Mets season felt like receiving a holiday present we were excited about, but after finding it unsatisfactory, we decided it might be best to return it...The year started well enough: 114 calendar days in first place, but then Jacob deGrom, feeling tightness in his right forearm, went on the I. L. June 18th and never returned. The year went quickly downhill from there. Michael Conforto, Jeff McNeil, and the $341 million man, Francisco Lindor, turned out to be huge disappointments, performing well below their expected production at the plate. Lindor (20 HR, 63 RBI) never acquired any consistency as a hitter; Conforto (14 HR, 55 RBI) seemed lost at the plate most of the season; and McNeil muddled through a season of angst at the bat and in the field, including a brief dugout tussle with Lindor about their keystone combination duties. The acquisition of Javier Baez from the Cubs at the trade deadline, to complement Lindor, did not significantly change the atmosphere. Carlos Carrasco (1 win) joined the pitching staff late in the season but was ineffective...Pete Alonso hit 37 bombs and led the team with 94 RBI. Marcus Stroman won 10 ballgames and struck out 158 to lead the mound crew. Jonathan Villar and Kevin Pillar provided much needed depth on the bench.
