How does the ballclub with the best overall record in the major leagues NOT make the playoffs? All it takes is a 50-day players strike, a split season format, and only the teams finishing first in each half qualifying for the post-season. In the case of the Redlegs, they could cry a loud FOUL. Cincinnati completed the abbreviated campaign with THAT best record, BUT finished each half of the season in SECOND place of the NL West with marks of 35-21 (½ game out) and 31-21 (1 ½ games behind). Against the division, the Reds were a combined 40-25...Tom Seaver may not have been throwing smoke any longer, but he was tied by four others for the most wins in the big leagues with fourteen. His record was 14-2, a major league leading .875 winning percentage. At 36, he finished second in Cy Young Award voting in the National League. Twenty-four-year-old Mario Soto pitched well enough to place himself among major league leaders with 12 wins (tie for 10th); strikeouts (151, 3rd); and complete games (10, tied for 8th). He and Bruce Berenyi both pitched three shutouts. Berenyi posted 106 punch outs...The Reds hit .267 as a team (second in the N. L.). George Foster, 32, finished the season among major league leaders in home runs (22); slugging percentage (.519); OPS (.892); and RBI (90). Davey Concepcion, 33, was ninth with 129 base hits; tied for fifth with 28 doubles; and tied for tenth with 67 RBI. Dave Collins tied for ninth with 26 stolen bases. Ken Griffey, Sr. (65 runs scored) tied for eighth in the big leagues. Johnny Bench, now 33, was relieved of his full-time catching duties and while playing mostly first base he hit eight home runs and drove in twenty-five over 52 games played and 178 at bats.
