The defending American League champions had a "tale of two seasons" like any other ballclub in baseball in 1981. The long list of disagreements (too long to list here) primed the decision for the Major League Baseball Players Association and the major league team owners to shutdown the season June 12th. The Royals played .400 baseball (20-30, 5th place of the AL West) up until the abrupt halt of play. The team hit 25 home runs, batted .264, and posted a 4.17 ERA from the pitching staff to complete the first half. With an agreement between the two leading factions of the game, play resumed in August with no plans to make up the canceled games. The Royals perked up in the second half, finishing in first place with a 30-23 record, a .270 team BA, 36 homers, and a staff ERA of 2.99. (Jim Frey was let go as manager August 31st with the Royals ten games under .500 and replaced by Dick Howser.) The first place winner of each half were designated to meet in a Division Series prior to the start of the ALCS. For the first time in major league history, a team with a losing record (the Royals at 50-53 overall) qualified for MLB's post-season. With two half-seasons combined, K. C. was a fourth place ballclub 11 games behind the Oakland A's...Those same A's, playing a brand of old-time style baseball under Billy Martin (Billy Ball) had won the first half of the season to square off versus the Royals in the first round. The best of five series commenced at Royals Stadium where the A's took the first two games, allowing Kansas City only ten hits and a single run. The curtain closer came in Oakland, the A's scoring two runs early in the game while allowing the Royals one run in the fourth. Oakland put two more runs on the scoreboard in the bottom half of the inning and held on to win, 4-1, despite three A's pitchers being raked for ten hits. In the series, George Brett batted .167 with no extra-base hits. The Royals offense (.267 BA during the regular season) was squelched to just one double and no home runs in the three games...Willie Wilson ended the year among major league leaders with 133 base hits, stolen bases (34), triples (7), and singles (115). First baseman Willie Aikens finished seventh in the majors with 62 walks. Brett tallied 27 doubles in the Royals 103 games...Pitcher Dennis Leonard led the majors in innings pitched and games started and was among the leaders in strikeouts (107). Larry Gura tied the A's Mike Norris for fourth place in complete games (14); closer Dan Quisenberry tied for fifth with his 18 saves.
