By the 1981 season, the Brewers were a franchise on a clear identifiable upswing. They celebrated their first 90+ win year in 1978 followed by another in 1979. By that time, two young twenty-somethings and budding stars, Robin Yount (25) and Paul Molitor (24), had arrived on the scene to compliment the veteran presence on the roster--names like Bando (Sal), Cecil Cooper, Larry Hise, "Stormin' Gorman" Thomas, Don Money, and Ben Oglivie. The pitching staff was consistently good but not spectacular. What was missing was an elite closer to nail down ballgames. Thirty-four-year-old "Rollie" Fingers was the man who joined the staff as part of a seven-player trade with St. Louis during the off-season to fulfill that critical role. All the waxed handlebar-mustachioed Fingers did was become the sixth pitcher in major league history to win both the Cy Young Award and the Most Valuable Player honor in the same league in the same season. His miniscule ERA and major league leading save total tell part of the story. Catcher Ted Simmons, 31, was another ingredient added to the mix in the Fingers trade, managed by Bob "Buck" Rodgers who had replaced George Bamberger mid-season 1980...The Brewers momentum was rudely curtailed on June 12th when major league players walked out on strike. Milwaukee, hanging around the division leaders, was third in the AL East at the time with a 31-25 record, three games out of first. They rallied in the second half, going 31-22 and finishing first. The split season also meant the two first place ballclubs from each half would battle in a division series, the winner moving on to the ALCS. The Yankees won the first two contests of a best-of-five series in Milwaukee, the Brewers the third and fourth games in New York. The deciding fifth game was played at Yankee Stadium. The Brewers were up 2-0 until the bottom of the fourth when the Yankees answered with four runs on two two-run homers and a total of five hits. In the seventh, a triple by Robin Yount, followed by a single off the bat of Cecil Cooper, scored the Brewers third run which is all they would muster the rest of the way. New York scored again in the seventh inning with a solo home run then wrapped up the series with two runs in the eighth to eliminate the Brewers, 7-3. Among the regulars, Yount had the best series, hitting .316 (6 for 19), including a home run and double. Milwaukee was outthit by the Bronx Bombers .304 to .222. Fingers saved Game Four and struck out five in 4.2 innings pitched...Pete Vuckovich (another figure in the St. Louis trade) tied four others for the most wins in the majors (14) while his .778 winning percentage was second best...Cecil Cooper was tied by the Cubs Bill Buckner for the most doubles in the big leagues (35). He finished seventh in batting average, sixth in runs scored (64), and tied for fourth in base hits (133). Gorman Thomas's 21 jacks were also among the game's leaders. He knocked in 65 runs. Ben Oglivie's 72 RBI placed him sixth.
