The Cardinals were an aging ballclub led by the newly installed field manager and former Redbird, "Red" Schoendienst, as well as the General Manager, Bob Howsam. Howsam had an interesting introduction to the St. Louis organization. A Denver native, he had been a prime promoter of bringing both major league baseball and professional football to The Mile High City. He succeeded in the latter, but was later hired by the Cardinals well-heeled advisor to owner Gussie Busch, Branch Rickey. (Howsam and Rickey had also worked in tandem attempting to bring big league baseball to Denver.) Howsam officially took the reins in the GM's office in late 1964 and went to work. But before making major moves for 1966, he oversaw a team which bobbed around the .500 mark all season, never challenging for a repeat as NL champs. The reigning World Champions had some of the best players in the majors on the roster: First, there's Bob Gibson, in his prime at 29, who won 20 games, completed 20, and tossed six shutouts. He finished the year fourth in the big leagues with 270 strikeouts (8.127 per 9 innings pitched, 8th place). As a very competent hitter, he clubbed five homers and drove home 19. His only blemish was allowing a big league-high 34 home runs. Next, there's Lou Brock who was second in the majors in stolen bases to Maury Wills. He popped 16 homers and ended the year among the top ten MLB leaders in doubles (35, tied for 6th); runs scored (107, tied for 8th); and base hits (182, tied for 10th). Outstanding centerfielder Curt Flood's batting average was eighth-best in the majors. He was fifth in base hits (191) and led the Cards with 83 RBI. Slick-fielding first baseman Bill White had the most home runs (24) and knocked in seventy-three. Ken Boyer was second on the team with 75 RBI. Boyer contributed 13 jacks while Flood hit eleven.
