The Cubs hit their high-point of the season July 16th ten games over .500 and in second place, 5 ½ games out of first. For the most part, they would play .500 baseball the entire schedule. The team had settled into third by the All Star break, 4 ½ games behind...Owner Phil Wrigley's ill-thought and hardly successful theory of using a round-table of "head coaches" to manage the team on the field was ditched starting with the '63 campaign. He named Bob Kennedy to be the general from the dugout for all 162 games...One of Kennedy's players who took the field for all 162 contests, Ron Santo, led the Cubbies with 99 RBI, four ahead of fellow gamer "Sweet Swingin'" Billy Williams (161 games played). Santo was tied with Williams for the team high in homers (25). The Cubs Gold Glove third-sacker collected the seventh-most base hits in the majors (187). Williams tied with the Phillies Johnny Callison in doubles (36), fourth-most in the big leagues. Twenty-four-year old Lou Brock's 11 triples tied three others for sixth...The pitching staff was a solid corps which finished second in the league with a 3.08 ERA. Lot's of quality here: Dick Ellsworth was among major league leaders in wins (22), earned run average (2nd), and complete games (19, 3rd). Larry Jackson won 14 ballgames, dropped 18, but was tenth in the big leagues with a 2.55 ERA. Closer Lindy McDaniel racked-up the third-most saves. McDaniel earned 13 wins working solely out of the bullpen; starter Bob Buhl added 11 victories...Catcher Dick Bertell produced off-the-chart numbers behind the plate. In combination with his pitchers, Bertell tossed out 61 percent of would-be base stealers (45 of 74 attempts). Ernie Banks contributed 18 home runs.
