"The Great One," Roberto Clemente, was among the best in baseball, finishing third overall in batting average and sixth in hits (192). Of those base hits, 144 were singles. However, Clemente led the Buccos in home runs (17), RBI (76), OBP (.356) and OPS (.826). The golden-armed right fielder was awarded his third career Gold Glove and gunned down 11 base runners. Even with all that, he was fourteenth in MVP voting. Donn Clendenon was second with 15 homers and 57 RBI. Wilver Dornel "Willie" Stargell wrapped up his first full major league season playing most of the time across the outfield and a handful of turns at first base. He belted 11 home runs and knocked in 47. Back-stop Jim Pagliaroni hit 11 jacks as well...Bob Friend was the ace of the pitching staff with 17 wins, 12 complete games, and 144 strikeouts. His ERA was fourth-best in the big leagues and his stinginess resulted with the fifth-best WHIP (1.042) per nine innings pitched, the sixth-fewest walks (1.474 per nine innings, a total of 44) and the ninth-fewest home runs allowed (.435) per nine innings. He totaled only 13 homers given up over 268.2 innings pitched. Don Cardwell and Al McBean both posted 13 victories...The Pirates, at the most, were six games over .500 during the season (May 6th) but after winning a doubleheader from the Reds at Forbes Field, June 5th, the next day they became a second division ball club the remainder of the year...Vernon Law's season was limited due to arm/shoulder miseries which had surfaced as early as 1960. He had begun to notice the discomfort as he drove home across the country after the Pirates' World Series victory. The same ailments had forced him off the mound for extended periods in '61 and '62.
